An important meeting was held at the London last night at which resolutions were passed expressing satisfaction with the government's appointment of chief of the British Science Commission. Chamberlain replied to the resolutions and said the Toronto Globe had misinterpreted his remarks about Canada.

N. W. COUNCIL.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE NINTH SESSION.

REGINA, Wednesday, Oct. 19.

Council only sat fifteen minutes today. Mr. Secord presented a petition praying for amendment to ordinance of '86 legalizing mill bonus by-law of the town of Regina.

A special committee was appointed to consider several questions relating to the Metis of the Territories, also one to consider section 178, Municipal Ordinance of '85, and section 5, Joint Stock Companies Ordinance of '86.

Bill amending and consolidating game law was ordered to be printed for distribution before being read a second time.

At request of Judge Richardson the second reading of the Statute Labor Bill was allowed to stand for one day.

Committee on Civil Justice reported that documents from the Secretary of State pointed out irregularities in certain clauses of Cemetery Ordinance and Judge Richardson introduced a bill repealing sub-sections 1, 2 and 5 of Sec. 23 of the Cemetery Ordinance of '86.

REGINA, Thursday, Oct. 20.

Special committee on the application for incorporation of the Calgary Gas and Waterworks Company reported that the requirements of the law had been complied with.

It appears that the committee are deferring definitely recommending charter until the resolutions, passed by the town council of Calgary, respecting this matter, which have been sent for are received.

The Ordinance respecting bulls was read a second time.

Moved by Mr. Cayley, seconded by Mr. Turfitt—that the Dominion Government be requested to submit to the people of the Northwest Territories at the forthcoming election of members to the Northwest Council or Legislative Assembly, as the case may be, the question of granting a license or a total prohibition system to the Northwest, and that new legislative action in regard to the liquor question be introduced by the Dominion Government upon the result of such vote.

Mr. Haultain moved in amendment that a special committee be appointed to consider the liquor question.

Both motions and amendment were declared out of order as proper notice had not been given. Mr. Cayley had given notice of a motion requesting the Lieutenant-Governor to grant permits to sell liquor to certain parties in Calgary but finding that it was doubtful if anyone could be got to favor this motion besides the second, he substituted the above, and the matter will come up again.

The Civil Justice Committee were requested to make a report as to whether the council has power or not to pass a Bill for the protection of railway employees from accidents.

Mr. Turfitt introduced a bill respecting Agricultural Societies which was read for a first time.

Council went into committee of the whole on the bill for establishing statute labor districts. Mr. Cayley in the chair. An interesting discussion took place on clause 2. Messrs. Secord, Wilson and Haultain claiming that the people should not be compelled to form such districts unless they wished, and Messrs. Crawford, Ross, Turfitt, Sutherland and Jolly contending that people outside of municipalities should be compelled to keep up their roads and bridges. A motion of Mr. Secord's to cancel clause 2 was defeated by a vote of six to nine. It was decided to let the clause stand over. Judge Richardson thought they could not proceed with the bill as all the other clauses being on clause 2, and he pointed out that no provision had been made for the sale of lands of non residents who did not perform their statute labor. It was finally decided to refer the bill back to the special committee, for a reconsideration of the whole subject.

Bill repealing certain clauses of cemetery ordinance was given its second and third readings and ordered to be engrossed.

REGINA, Friday, Oct. 21.

All the members present at today's session except Judge Rouleau and Messrs. Marchand and Bedford.

Mr. Cayley presented a petition from the taxpayers of Calgary asking that a reduction of at least two-thirds be made in the tariff of fees of the clerks of supreme courts. The petition stated that at high as $4,000 had been collected by the clerk at Calgary during the past year.

Mr. Secord moved to amend the bill by inserting in clause 2, "and the people of the Territories shall be permitted to form such districts unless they wished, and Messrs. Crawford, Ross, Turfitt, Sutherland and Jolly contending that people outside of municipalities should be compelled to keep up their roads and bridges. to the memorial sent last session was laid on the table.

Hughes—W. H. H. That the reply to the memorial to the Dominion Government by this council asking that pensions be granted to the widows and children of the Prince Albert volunteers killed at Duck Lake be laid on the table.

The bill incorporating the Calgary Gas and Waterworks Company was given its first reading and referred to a special committee, consisting of Judge Richardson, Judge McCleod, Messrs. Haultain, Crawford, Ross, Sutherland, Lauder and Cayley.

Lieut.-Governor introduced bills amending ordinance respecting prairie fires and companies ordinance of '86.

Mr. Ross asked where the librarian was, he had not seen him at his duties, had required his services that day and been unable to find him (laughter). Lt.-Governor replied that he had given the librarian a room up stairs during the session and his absence today was due to illness.

The motion to go into committee of the whole on game ordinance was opposed by Messrs. Secord and Cayley as they wished to have time to submit draft of bill to the game clubs of Calgary and Regina. They were assured that there would be time before it was finally passed. In committee the end of the close season for prairie chickens was changed back to Sept. 1st. Committee reported progress.

Council went into committee of the whole on bill to amend ordinance respecting bulls. This bill provides that the close season for bulls will be only three months in the ranching districts, by the present ordinance it is all the year round. Progress reported by the committee when the council adjourned.

REGINA, Monday, Oct. 24.

The Lt. Governor, on recommendation of civil justice committee, introduced a bill to amend and consolidate ordinances relating to mortgages and sales of personal property. Read a first time. This bill is to simplify registration of such documents which the division of the Territories into judicial districts had complicated.

The agricultural committee reported bill respecting agricultural societies with amendments; also recommended referring correspondence questioning legality of fire ordinance of '86 to civil justice committee, which was done.

The Lt. Governor laid on the table a printed statement of the receipts and expenditures of the general revenue fund of the Northwest Territories; also from the secretary of state an order-in-council allowing lines under the Northwest liquor law to go to the general revenue fund of the Territories. This last announcement was received with applause, as it will add many thousands of dollars to the revenue of the Territories.

Mr. Haultain announced his intention to introduce a bill to amend the exemption ordinance.

Upon motion by Crawford and Sutherland the Lt. Governor was asked to take steps to have the prevention and extinction of prairie fires made one of the special duties of the mounted police. His Honor promised to urge the matter upon the commissioner.

Adjourned.

REGINA, Tuesday, Oct. 25.

Mr. Haultain introduced a bill to amend exemption ordinance which was read a first time.

Mr. Cayley introduced a bill to amend the municipal ordinance of '85 and '86, referred to a special committee.

The Lt. Governor laid on the table a return of the fees collected by the clerks of the supreme court. It shows the following collections: Eastern Assiniboia, for three months and ten days, $346.95; Western Assiniboia, for six months, $895.17; Saskatchewan, no return; Southern Alberta, for one month and thirteen days, $881.81; Northern Alberta, for six months, $940.10.

The Council went into committee of the whole on bill to amend the ordinance for the protection of game. In the discussion it was pointed out that game was very destructive to crops by some districts and they were consequently given no protection under any of the clauses. The committee reported, and the bill was read a second time and ordered engrossed.

The bill respecting bulls was briefly discussed in committee of the whole, reported, read a second time and ordered engrossed.

The bill establishing statute labor districts was discussed at great length in committee of the whole. It was announced that a majority petitioning against the formation of a district would prevent it being proclaimed. School teachers were made subject to statute labor, and a motion to make the system also subject was defeated by a vote of six to eleven. The committee reported progress and Council adjourned.

At a meeting of the council, Mr. Haultain was elected president and Mr. Secord vice-president. The council then proceeded to consider the petition from the taxpayers of Calgary asking that a reduction of at least two-thirds be made in the tariff of fees of the clerks of supreme courts. The petition stated that at high as $4,000 had been collected by the clerk at Calgary during the past year.

LOVER AND HUSBAND.

"It is an East Indian drug, and was given to me by a Brahmin of high caste," Royal Rayne said, holding in his extended hand a small vial containing an amber-colored liquid. "The natives claim for it some very peculiar properties, but I have never felt any disposition to test it for myself."

A wild storm was raging without, and twilight found us clustered about the fire that had been laid on the hearth of the roomy old hall.

The dull, rainy day had depressed all our spirits, and it was to enliven us by a diversion of some sort that Royal Rayne, the life of every gathering honored by his presence, had plunged into a board of treasures, accumulated from the Amazon to the Ganges and "furthest Ind," and brought forth the interesting drug.

Royal Rayne! I seem to see him now as I saw him that night, with the ruddy fire-light flashing over his dark, splendid face and noble figure, as kindly in bearing as he was in name—a man all the women adored and all the men envied.

"Tell us something about it, Mr. Rayne," entreated Vera, my six months' bride, lifting her sweet face and involuntarily drawing nearer.

I had noticed before how this princely man, with his winning smile and wondrous vitality, seemed to attract weaker natures. Children always gathered about him, and once or twice, for our diversion, he had charmed the wild, beautiful songsters from their native shrines to perch upon his hand.

But it gave me a jealous pang that my innocent Vera should fall ever so slightly under his spell.

"I do not know from what it is prepared, or the use the Brahmins make of it," Mrs. Delmar, he replied, in the soft, musical tones that constituted one of his greatest charms; "but it is said to affect the mind very strangely. While under its influence, the brain works with such lightning-like rapidity that one may fancy himself to pass through all the stirring events of a long life in a very few moments of time."

The way in which his glowing dark eyes lingered upon my wife's face irritated me, and I said, indignantly:

"Nonsense! I am not so credulous as to believe it has any such power as you claim for it."

"The drug is harmless. Perhaps you would like to test it?"

"Oh, Roger, don't!" cried Vera, in alarm.

The only effect of her appeal was to confirm the resolve I had taken the instant Rayne addressed those words to me, as if daring me to make the experiment.

"What is the dose?" I asked, taking the vial in my own hand.

"Two drops in half a glass of water," he replied.

"Here are four—a double portion," and I deliberately measured them into a glass that stood on a table at my elbow.

"I shall soon know if there is any virtue in the drug."

Swallowing the last drop of the preparation, I leaned back in my easy-chair, gazing at Royal Rayne half-contemptuously.

He returned my look, and all at once it seemed as if something black fell before my eyes. It was gone in a moment, and then I perceived that Vera was also regarding me with a strange, speculating expression I had never seen upon her face before.

"How do you feel, Roger?" she asked, in what was evidently intended for a seductive tone.

"Very much as usual. The drug is a humbug."

"You think so because you are of a temperament to throw off its influence. But it certainly would affect some persons precisely as I have described."

My only answer was a contemptuous smile.

Shortly afterward some one arose—there were half a dozen guests staying in the house—and the circle was broken. But Rayne and my wife remained. When they fancied I had become interested in a book I had taken up, Vera flitted to the niche beyond the glowing hearth where Rayne was at that moment standing and said in a whisper:

"Roger looks and acts strangely. What if that yellow liquid should be a deadly poison?"

"Would you care so very much?" he answered back in a tone that chilled my blood.

I do not know what response she made to it—probably only a look. But she laughed softly, and after a moment, picked up the book and threw herself upon it as if it were her only friend.

I could have struck her as she lifted her slipper, lovely face. It was the first time since our marriage that I had ever seen her so calm. Only by a determined effort to the will could I help betraying the horror and distrust that had taken possession of my mind.

"Dear Roger, I am glad that horrid drug did not make you ill!" she purred, but her eyes dropped, refusing to meet my searching gaze.

Later, when she had retired to her own room, and I was crouching upon the rug, my own thoughts were in a greater turmoil than the elements, two of the candles came and stood at the window just above.

"Do you think Mr. Delmar knows?" were the words that came to my ears clear and distinct.

"Knows what? How shamelessly his wife is flirting with Royal Rayne?"

"Yes."

"It is doubtful. The honeymoon is scarcely over, and a man in love is proverbially blind. He no doubt thinks his wife a modern Lucretia."

"What a shame that he should be so deceived!" Rayne, said Mrs. Delmar's eyes before he went abroad, I believe?"

"So the gossip say. Scandalous stories were told of them even then. But Rayne was not a marrying man, and gave his pretty sweetheart the go-by. She married Mr. Delmar for his money."

The speakers left the window. But I had heard enough. I was not a marrying man, and gave his pretty sweetheart the go-by. She married Mr. Delmar for his money."

Were all Vera's kisses and tender words the snares of a hypocrite?

I would watch—convince myself, as should this dreadful thing prove true exact a terrible penalty.

They were extremely careful in my presence, but the next day, as we were leaving the breakfast-table, I saw Rayne slip a note into Vera's hand. She stole away by herself to read it.

Several hours later, when she was out upon the lawn with our guests, the gayest of them all, I sought her dressing-rooms. A bit of crumpled paper lay on the carpet before the dressing-table. Smoothing it on my knee I read these words:

"Six o'clock. The old summer-house."

An appointment! It had even come to that.

While I stood there, tramping the note in my trembling hand, I decided upon the course of action I would pursue.

Among my possessions was a large Siberian bloodhound I had purchased abroad. Though faithful and gentle to me, he could be very ferocious, and was an object of terror to all our guests, Rayne included. The spell of fascination he exerted over nearly every living creature was powerless with this sagacious beast.

As the day wore on, and the specified hour approached, Vera laughingly excused herself, and left her guests. After going up-stairs, she stole forth at a side door, and walked swiftly in the direction of the summer-house.

It was the signal for which I waited. Proceeding to Tiger's kennel, and loosing his chain, bade him follow me.

The summer-house was a quaint structure of two stories, standing in a remote part of the grounds. Dense shrubbery shut it in.

Taking Tiger by the collar, I drew him under cover of some bushes near the door, where he was entirely concealed from observation.

"Let no one pass, sir," I said in a fierce whisper, and the intelligent animal gave a low growl, as though he fully understood what was expected of him.

A flight of stairs led from the ground floor to the more comfortable room above.

Vera's face was a study when she heard my step, and looking up, saw me standing in the open door. The flush died suddenly out of her cheeks, the eager light from her eyes. She started up from the rustic seat, pallid and trembling.

"Why, Roger, what brings you here?" she stammered. "Did you come to seek me?"

"Yes, Vera," I answered, drawing her down beside me upon the bench. "Come, be seated again. It will be so nice to have a te-a-tete for once, away from our guests."

I spoke calmly, but she must have seen something unusual in my face; or she must have hoped to get me away before her lover appeared. All at once she began to struggle in my arms.

"Let me go, Roger. I cannot remain here. Our guests will wonder at our absence, and take offense. Let us return to the house. At once."

"Wait. Sing just one of the old songs with which you used to enchant me."

"Another time, Roger. Really—"

"She was struggling again. I held her as in a vise."

Suddenly a step sounded in the path below. Vera grew still as death all at once, a look of awful terror creeping over her face.

While we remained motionless, staring into each other's eyes, a hoarse growl came to our ears, succeeded immediately by a wild, terrified cry. Vera seemed to quiver when I truthfully said:

"Tiger!" she panted rather than said.

"You have let him loose!"

"He has crept on her knees, and lifted her up a hand."

"Roger, be merciful! Call off the dog. Murder will be done. Go, for heaven's sake, or it will be too late."

I listened with smiling lips.

A snarling sound came from below mingled with moans of pain. I called away at last.

Vera made a desperate effort, but from my hold, and rushed screaming down the stairs.

I followed.

A horrible sight met my gaze when I reached the lawn. Royal Rayne lay across the path, bruised and bleeding, his white face and staring eyes turned to the pallid sky. Near his head lay a dead, motionless, his jaws stopped with gore.

Vera tottered forward, and then herself across the dead body of her lover.

"Oh, Heaven! he is dead!"

Her wild cry and shriek drew me. I rushed her roughly to the ground and lay down upon her. She was motionless, her eyes staring, her lips blue, her hands cold and stiff.

A sort of frenzy seemed to take possession of me.

"Yes," I said. "Tiger has done his work well. I knew the instant that you would be trusted to my hands. You would rather join your persecuted, no doubt, than live with me."

"Yes," she answered, "I know all, and I will not be false to truth. I loved him."

Then she lifted her face, all her voice coming back.

"Life is valuable to me now. Kill me, too, and so complete the work of vengeance."

"I will," was my answer.

And drawing a knife, I plunged it into her bosom.

She expired with a scream. A smile of heavenly sweetness seemed to hover about her lips as she lay back upon the grass, her life-blood mingling its stream with Royal Rayne's. Ah, heaven! how beautiful she was—more beautiful than ever in the hey-day of youth! The fatal beauty that had been of those two the bane.

I was stunned for a while, but finally my senses returned. Something must be done to conceal the crime I had committed.

Taking Vera's lifeless body in my arms, I bore it to the rear of the summer-house, where some stones forming the foundation wall were loose, and thrusting it through the aperture, replaced every-

As the evening wore on, my whisper and significant glances were exchanged. The continued absence of Vera and Royal Rayne was being commented on, and one of the elder ladies said, in an audible whisper:

"Of course, they have fled. It is strange how Mr. Delmar can remain ignorant of what is so patent to everybody else."

The next morning Rayne's body was discovered near the summer house, where I had left it; but there could be no uncertainty as to how he had met his fate. The imprint of Tiger's teeth was all too visible in his purple throat.

Everybody was startled, and there was a great commotion.

Then the natural query arose: What had become of Vera? The gossip were not long in stepping to the front with a theory. She had been crazed by the sight of her dead lover, they said, and was wandering aimlessly about the country.

To encourage this belief, I sent scouting parties in every direction; the whole neighborhood joined in the search.

From all sides came expressions of sympathy and condolence. I was looked upon as a martyr.

But oh! the long, dreadful days and horrible nights! Often did I waken from troubled dreams, a cold sweat bedewing my forehead, to see Vera's dead staring at me out of the darkness.

An indefinable fascination drew me daily to the spot where I had concealed the body. I felt a morbid longing to behold her again and mark the changes death had wrought.

One morning, unable longer to resist the impulse, I stole secretly to the summer-house, and removing the stones, crawled forth to the body of my victim.

I had scarcely done this when a strong hand clutched my arm. An officer of the law was standing at my elbow.

"I suspected you from the first," he said, with a leer. "Now there can be no doubt of your guilt. It becomes my duty to place you under arrest for the murder of your wife."

I started and rubbed my eyes. The man's face seemed to be transfused with all in once. It was Royal Rayne who stood before me, shaking me vigorously.

"Wake up, delirious, and tell us what you think now of the East Indian drug!" I flung him off with a shriek of horror, and looked around in utter bewilderment.

I was sitting before the fire in the morning, with the storm still howling outside. I saw my darling wife coming down the stairs, an expression of pain on her pretty face. The sound of her voice aroused me as from a trance. "Oh, I see," she cried, "how strangely you look. Never try such an experiment again."

It was Vera herself, alive and well. Everything that had seemed so impossible in the shadow before my eyes was now a dream.

For a moment of the presence of others, I drew her to my arms, kissed her reverently, and burst into tears of joy and thanksgiving.

Royal Rayne is now my best friend, and I have never had the least occasion to regret my act. At my next report I shall draw away the veil concealing the secret of my cure.

It is all well enough to say there is nothing in a name; but suppose a man named Slaughter should start a summer hotel, and call it Slaughter House?

There must be some writing and some drawing in these days concerning the decoration of food. Happily, the old idea that nice things are made by magic has almost disappeared. People are beginning to realize that a dinner party is a social event, and that the food is only a means to an end. The food is not the end, but the means to the end. The food is not the end, but the means to the end. The food is not the end, but the means to the end.

MOTHERS PUDDING.
Put one pint of good cream on to boil in a double boiler. Beat the yolks of six eggs and one cup (half a pint) of granulated sugar until light. Then stir the cream through into the boiling cream; cook and stir until it thickens (about one minute). Remove from the fire, add one pint of fruit from the fire, add another pint of cream, and stand aside to cool. When cold, add a little sugar and beat again. Put in the freezer and freeze. When frozen, remove the tacher, pack the pudding in a tin, and freeze. It is a very good "well" in the centre. Fill this "well" with strawberry water-ice or orange-ice, colored with cranberry juice, and let it freeze. When ready to eat, have taken out. Repeat with salt and ice, and let stand until wanted, not less than two hours. Serve with the following sauce:

Put in a bowl

Sauces. Cover one tablespoonful of gelatine with a little cold water and soak a half hour. Put one pint of cream on to boil in a double boiler. Beat the yolks of three eggs and a quarter cup of sugar together until light; add them to the boiling cream; stir until it thickens, about one minute; add the gelatine; stir until dissolved; take from the fire, add one teaspoonful of vanilla, and stand away to cool. When cold, if you use wine, add two tablespoonfuls of brandy and four of sherry. Serve ice cold.

Strawberry Water-Ice. Add a half pound of sugar and the juice of one lemon to one pint of berries; then mash them, and stand aside one hour; then strain through a fine sieve, add one pint of cold water, and freeze. This quantity is just sufficient for the pudding.

SNOWFLAKE CAKE.
Coffee cup of butter, two and a half coffee cups of sugar, one coffee cup of milk, stir to a cream, add the frothed whites of twelve eggs, four cups of flour, three tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, two heaping teaspoonfuls of baking powder stirred in the flour. Mix butter and sugar with flour, add eggs last, flavor, have a steam oven for coloring.

MARKING FOR MEATS, AND POKE.

Mutton should be judged by its fine grain, deep color and white fat; and also by the firmness of its texture, and sound principles. If the latter has a greenish or yellowish cast, it is stale, and will not keep. The best mutton is the cheapest part for stews is the breast. This part can be bought at half its price in the winter. A level of mutton, three pounds would make six stews, while a pound of the same would give a pound of mutton to six appetites. If the meat appears tough and thick, then it is stale. The best mutton is the young and young pork is most desirable. When very fresh the meat will be tender, and should not be boiled with a long hot pot. In dressing hams, a good deal of salt is necessary to keep them tight, and the lean of a good cure and sticking porker fat is the best. The fat of a good cure is the most particular about hams, and stick a sharp knife under the ham. If it comes out, it is stale. If it is not, it is fresh. If the knife is dashed and has a mucous smell, don't buy it.

The "baulet," as it used to be called, was formerly sold for tea, but now the liver is much more expensive. Half a pound will suffice to make this dish. Lay the liver with strips of pork, brown it, and the sliced liver with a very little oil, and season with salt, pepper, and add some salt, pepper and herbs, with some hot water and a teaspoonful of vinegar; cover the pan and shake it frequently, so that the liver may be well cooked. Cook for an hour and a half, then add three large or small carrots, cut in rola two inches long, and some little country pease, stew in the same liquor for half an hour, and serve it all hot. The first white salt that comes for landing is entirely free from any of the usual objections to salt pork.
